

Two Brothers, One Destiny

Writer: Muhammad Awais (Laal)

Part One — Two Brothers, One Destiny

In the vast, sun-baked lands of Thal Mirwah, where grains of sand shimmered in the sunlight and danced with the wind, lived two brothers — Jamali and Kamali.

Their father, Huzoor Bakhsh, had tilled the land with sweat and toil, spreading over a hundred acres. Yet the land, like the people who lived on it, was barren — no water, no canal, no well, no help in sight. Only the sky stretched overhead, sometimes merciful, often indifferent.

Time moved on. Huzoor Bakhsh grew old, but the lamp of hope in his heart never dimmed. He would often tell his sons:

“Children, this land is gold. But only hands that endure the thorns of labor can harvest its wealth.”

Jamali was obedient, quiet, and diligent. He rose with the sun, herded the goats to the pasture, and protected them until dusk.

Kamali, on the other hand, had a restless heart — one drawn to chance and gambling, his veins flowing with the thrill of fate.

Though old, Huzoor Bakhsh loved both sons equally. Every day, he prayed:

“O Allah, bless my sons with prosperity. May one’s wisdom match the other’s fortune.”

But fate had its own plan.

Kamali lost half their herd to a gamble.

When Jamali learned of it, he bowed his head silently.

“Brother, that herd was our support...”

Kamali laughed, “I tried my luck. Luck was not on my side.”

Time passed, and poverty deepened.

The father’s life waned, and the household fire burned only because of Jamali’s efforts.

He worked tirelessly at the city’s flour mill, bringing home every penny to sustain the family.

“Brother, you are older; you know best how to run the house,” he would say.

This was his faith — the faith to honor family and duty.

Then came the day Huzoor Bakhsh fell to a high fever. Medicine was scarce, the city far, and money nonexistent.

He lay burning in bed for three days, and on the fourth day, quietly passed away.

A heavy silence settled over the home.

The stove went cold, the courtyard emptied, and sorrow hung thick in the air.

Jamali sat by his father’s grave, weeping.

“Father, you said hard work bears fruit, but for whom do I toil now?”

The wind whispered back — silence and patience.

Days turned into months, months into years.

Kamali’s ways never changed, but Jamali’s courage grew.

He learned the craft of repairing old tube-well engines, traveling from village to village fixing broken machines.

The villagers never paid cash; they promised sacks of wheat at harvest time.

Even if an engine broke a hundred times in six months, Jamali worked without complaint.

When harvest arrived, he shared half the wheat with his brother Kamali.

The villagers were astonished.

“Jamali, your brother does nothing, yet you give him half?”

Jamali would smile, “A brother is a gift from Allah; sustenance is also from Allah.”

Time turned its wheel again.

An uncle offered his daughter, Chandi, to Jamali.

Chandi was gentle, patient, and pure of heart.

Their marriage brought a glimmer of joy to Jamali’s humble home.

Life was not easy, but hearts were content.

Chandi, the innocent girl with a tender soul, often went hungry at night but never complained.

Her three-year-old son, Sultan, was her solace.

Sometimes, a relative visiting to bake bread would secretly slip her two extra loaves.

Chandi would sit with Sultan, eat quietly, and whisper, “May Allah bless Jamali’s sustenance.”

But one night, her heart rebelled.

She thought, “I will no longer accept charity. I must ask Jamali — despite his hard labor, why does our hearth remain cold?”

When Jamali returned home that night,

Chandi’s patience broke.

Tears streamed down her face.

“You work every day, yet we sleep hungry!” she cried.

Jamali felt as though a stone had fallen on his heart.

“I give everything to Kamali,” he said softly.

The next morning, with the first light of dawn,

Jamali went to his brother and asked gently, “Kamali, why did you not give my family their share?”

Kamali’s face twisted in mockery.

“Your wife lies, Jamali! If you doubt me, take your own path.”

And so, that day became the day of separation.

Jamali packed his few belongings, held Chandi’s hand, carried Sultan, and built a modest hut on his own share of the land.

Over time, the clay hut grew into a two-room home — and the color of Jamali’s life began to change.

Part Two — Separation, Labor, and Walls of Hatred

Years passed.

Kamali abandoned gambling and greed, turning to trade, and became rich through wheat deals.

Jamali, meanwhile, continued to turn soil into gold with his hands, yet he remained humble, simple, and reliant on Allah.

But the walls of hatred between the brothers grew taller.
The children grew up with no bond between them.
Whenever Jamali spoke of reconciliation, stubbornness awoke in Kamali's heart.

Then fate struck.
Kamali suffered a major loss in business.
Drowning in debt, he approached Jamali, saying:
"Brother, help me. There is only one way to pay my debt —
our land in Northern Thal.
I want to install a solar tube-well and grow crops.
Add your land too, and we both will survive."

Jamali's heart softened, and he agreed.
He even persuaded relatives and villagers to lend Kamali their land temporarily.
Everyone trusted him.

A year passed.
Crops grew, wealth returned, debts were cleared —
but when the villagers asked for their land back, Kamali said, "This land is mine, not yours."

These words burned like fire.
The village erupted in strife.
Fights broke out, cases were filed, police arrived,
bribes were paid, and millions were wasted.
Kamali's son, Pearl, prouder and harsher than his father, fought everyone.

Through it all, Jamali remained silent.
He neither opposed nor supported anyone.
"I am tired," he said. "I only wish for peace."

But peace is seldom written in the fate of the simple-hearted.
The fire in Kamali's heart did not extinguish — he claimed the small land Jamali had given him as charity.
Ten acres —
and said, "This is your share; nothing more."

Part Three — Conclusion and Moral

Time, which once played with the sands of Northern Thal, had now etched wrinkles on the faces of both brothers.
The sun still rose,
but the horizon of their lives had shifted between light and shadow.

Jamali's life continued along the path of labor, patience, and sacrifice.
He toiled day and night, earning his living from the soil.
His sons had grown —
two joined the army,
one went to Saudi Arabia in search of work,
and the rest pursued education.

Jamali's body aged,
yet the fire of hard work burned in his spirit.
"I have seen hunger, but never eaten forbidden food.
I endured injustice, but never inflicted it," he would say.

Chandi, who once longed for a few pieces of bread,
now watched sacks of flour glinting in her daughters-in-law's hands,
and tears of gratitude fell from her eyes.
The home was filled with respect, peace, and the light of knowledge.
People called Jamali "Baba Jamali" with reverence.
Village disputes were brought to him,
and his word became law.

Kamali's world, in contrast, had shrunk.
Wealth surrounded him, yet his heart was empty.
His son Pearl's arrogance,
and a lifetime of cruelty, had stripped him of respect.
Villagers avoided his doorstep.
The tongue that once spoke with pride
now could only speak words of shame.

Business losses, lawsuits, bribery, and village disgrace —
all broke his spirit.
He would sit on his roof,

hearing laughter from Jamali's home,
his heart burning, lips murmuring:
"Perhaps Jamali was true..."

Jamali had reached out for reconciliation many times,
but the thorns of hatred never allowed a path.

Time moved on,
Kamali's face lost its glow.
Jamali grew old, heart-weary but content.
His home radiated respect and knowledge,
while Kamali's courtyard echoed with emptiness.

Moral of the Story

People say the land is precious,
but true wealth lies in the human heart.
A heart sown with hatred remains barren, no matter how vast the acres.
A heart sown with patience, love, and sacrifice can turn even barren soil fertile.

Kamali gained wealth but lost peace.
Jamali endured hunger but gained honor.
The world observed both —
and the truth is this:
a person's true wealth lies in character,
not in land, money, or status.

The elders of the village often repeat:

"He whose heart holds goodness, his fields are never empty."